CALGARY, ALBERTA, FEBRUARY 1, 2006--Photographers wishing to tap into the web as a forum for selling their photos now have an alternative to conventional Royalty-free Stock Photography providers, thanks to the launch of WorldWeb.com's new photo gallery. The gallery, which will continue to feature high-quality, tourism-related images, now provides photographers the unique opportunity to upload and sell their royalty-free, professional quality images via the WorldWeb.com site. What's more, photographers can upload images in up to three sizes, making them suitable for both print and web use, and are given full control over pricing within a commission-sharing framework.

" Having worked with WorldWeb.com in the past, I am excited about this new system of selling my photos through the WorldWeb.com site," said John Sharpe of Sharpshots Photography, "No other on-line resource gives photographers this much freedom to set their own pricing."

For the end user, the system is easy, fully web-based and does not require the purchase of a long-term membership, credits or additional software or plug-ins. Customers simply choose the photo they wish to buy, fill out their credit card information and within minutes, the image is ready to use in a variety of projects.

The launch of WorldWeb.com's new photo gallery has been released in conjunction with the a total site re-design and follows the December release of new interactive visitor maps using Google Inc.'s Map API.

WorldWeb.com is an up-to-date source of online travel information containing more than 200,000 pages of listings, photos, articles and maps for locations around the world. Online guides are available for Canada, the USA, the UK, Ireland, France, Italy, Australia, New Zealand, Bermuda and the Caribbean.
